

"The string-playing world was heavily represented in the audience, and no wonder. His aristocratic posture offers the eye a complement to the virtues the ear perceives. Mr. Neubauer's seamless control of the bow, his intonation, his rich and varied tonal palette, mark him as a member of the elite."

The New York Times

"It is an astonishing work (Joan Tower: Purple Rhapsody)— if you can just live through it. It assaults the senses and the emotions over and over, climbing scales in loud, jabbing, dissonant chords, ratcheting up intensity by layering agitated sounds on top of one another. Neubauer led the charge throughout, projecting powerful emissions from the lower registers, sawing on repeated pitches until the music came close to explosion, which it finally did at the end. His was an amazing performance by any standard. And he and Tower make quite a team. With Wild Purple, their first collaboration, and now Purple Rhapsody, they've made it impossible for the viola to ever again be dismissed as that nondescript entity somewhere between the violin and cello. Purple Rhapsody is extreme music for extreme times, and it achieves the impossible: It transforms the viola into an extreme, exciting instrument."

The Columbus Dispatch

"And Neubauer gave an exceptional performance of it (Joan Tower: Purple Rhapsody). The clarity and power of those opening low notes, the dazzling array of sounds he drew from his instrument, the fiery fiddling in the finale -- at times, Neubauer's playing was breathtaking. Yet although this is a showpiece for the viola, Neubauer never let it simply become showy. The emotional arc of the piece, from uncertainty and worry to exhilaration, was beautifully rendered."

Tulsa World

"A bigger more beautiful viola tone or a better command of the instrument's technical and interpretive possibilities seems inconceivable."

Daily News (New York)

"He plays his instrument with the kind of poise and maturity that place him at the top of the upper crust of musicians. Neubauer balances unflinching control, fluid bowing and sure-fire intonation with extraordinary depth of vision."

Los Angeles Times

"If there has been a better violist since William Primrose was in his prime more than a half-century ago, this listener does not know of him or her."

The Baltimore Sun

"I doubt that any viola player alive today gives a more penetrating and insightful reading of the "Arpeggione" than Paul Neubauer. He's thoroughly alive and reactive to every nuance and dynamic inflection. But he's also happy to let the music breathe naturally, particularly in the final movement, which can all too quickly degenerate into a shallow display of fast finger-and bow-work, without saying much, if anything, worthwhile about the music itself. Neubauer finds the right ebb and flow in shaping Schubert's lines, and I find his to be a totally persuasive approach. Recommended; many (and not just viola buffs) should find much to enjoy in Paul Neubauer's adroit "Arpeggione."

Fanfare

"Even more welcome is the fourth disc, which brings together the (Walton) Viola Concerto ... The viola soloist, Paul Neubauer, with his clean, firmly focused tone, keeps the music flowing in the hauntingly lyrical first movement. He is brilliant and incisive in the central Scherzo, and again in the finale he keeps the music flowing, relaxing seductively for the haunting epilogue, and using the widest possible dynamic range."

The Guardian

"Next came the viola transcription of Schumann's Five Pieces in Folk Style, in such a ravishing account by Paul Neubauer that you were left never wanting to hear them performed on cello again."

Townsville Bulletin (Australia)

"Paul Neubauer, the great American violist."

Daily Transcript (San Diego)

"His exquisite playing and his obvious love for the Bartók Viola Concerto, the work he helped revise, made an unstoppable combination. Neubauer's huge tone, warm yet animated, easily hit the back wall of the Eastman Theatre. You hung onto the energy of every note. He centered the work, musically and literally. The range of emotion in Neubauer's playing compares with the expressiveness of a great singer. The plaintive melodies are especially soulful, the spirited gypsy rhythms are particularly fiery. Neubauer's performance rated the bravos, which prompted a rare solo encore. But he didn't pick from the classical repertoire. His inspiration was the evening news. He played a true original: An Improvisation on the Washington Budget Battle. The hilarious, mocking little piece opened innocently enough with the melody from The Moldau. But then it gruffly imitated the haggling politicians, and dived sweetly into Hail to the Chief. What a treat!"

Democrat and Chronicle (Rochester)

"It's hard to imagine the solo viola part in Harold in Italy – better played than it was by Paul Neubauer. With a tone of depth as well as satin finish, he presided masterfully over ruffles and flourishes as well as lyric effusions."

The Dallas Morning News

"The program's highlight was the (Bartók) Viola Concerto, superbly played by Paul Neubauer...the work is a towering masterpiece, hauntingly beautiful, movingly expressive, encompassing every human emotion. The solo part exploits every resource of the instrument, making formidable demands on the violist. Neubauer was more than equal to its technical challenges, playing with consummate ease, an unfailingly beautiful, warm, mellow tone, and responding to every changing mood with inward expressiveness, authority and conviction. He received a standing ovation."

Epulse

"Brilliance of another sort illumined the first half, which featured Neubauer's CSO debut as well as the local premiere of the newly constructed version of the (Bartók) Viola Concerto. The result gives greater prominence to the viola and seems more grounded in the Hungarian folk idiom. Neubauer made his viola sing in all its ranges and timbres. The pure, distilled beauty of the slow movement produced a hush in the hall, while the dark plangence of the lower strings showcased the instrument's distinctive contralto. Neubauer displayed his arresting virtuosity by racing easily up and down the fingerboard, demonstrating that the viola can hold its own with its more popular cousins, the violin and cello."

The Cincinnati Post

"...the most admired chamber violist in this hemisphere."

Los Angeles Times

"Neubauer, the violist, is one of those performers who could galvanize an audience just by playing a C Major scale."

Newsday (New York)

"Neubauer probed the dark nostalgia of Robert Schumann's "Marchenbilder" for Viola and Piano with acute sensitivity, then teased two wonderful Fritz Kreisler pieces into radiant bloom. More wonderful still were pieces by Georges Boulanger that pushed the Kreisler tradition of elegant salon miniatures into the stratosphere. How composition this outrageously sly can be so vivid, touching and hilarious is Neubauer's secret: He owns this music, and to hear it from him is to inhabit a unique playground of delights."

The Washington Post

"The Bartok Viola Concerto was a particular revelation, primarily because its soloist, Paul Neubauer turned in a performance of almost magical grace and artistry. Neubauer offered the 1995 edition that he himself had a hand in creating, and it would be hard to imagine a more compelling, thoughtful or nuanced interpretation of it. With his laserlike intonation and buttery sound, Neubauer single-handedly raises the viola bar a full notch."

The Hartford Courant

"Neubauer is without question one of today's foremost violists. After intermission, he came onstage in Abravanel Hall to give a powerful performance of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." Neubauer possesses a beautiful tone; his playing is musical and expressive and filled with some of the most compelling lyricism of any concert artist today. He also has tremendous technical acumen. Nothing is impossible for him; he can dazzle his audience with his virtuosity and thrill them with his soft-edged melodicism. Together with Kogan, Neubauer gave one of the most dramatic and at the same time subtle and nuanced performances of the Berlioz imaginable."

Deseret News (Salt Lake City)

"For a modern reading that comes nearer than any to the original approach sanctioned by the composer (Walton), my own choice is Paul Neubauer with Andrew Litton and the Bournemouth orchestra..."

Gramophone

"When you hear a violist as superb as Neubauer, you have to regret that more composers did not write for the instrument."

Chicago Tribune

"Neubauer is a pleasure to watch as well as to hear. His physical motion when performing is both economical and elegant and that elegance is also expressed in his tone – colorful without a trace of throatiness – and his phrasing. His playing was highly atmospheric and evocative."

The Strad

"...the presentation of this version had a special meaning because of the splendid interpretation of Neubauer. With a robust sound, lots of nuances and impeccable intonation the American Violist, a true virtuoso in every sense of the word, went through the many difficult parts of the work with ease and musicality."

The Nation (Buenos Aires)

"Paul Neubauer is the Sir Yehudi Menuhin of the viola. Think of the purity, simplicity and frail beauty of Menuhin's violin playing and transpose to an alto without any loss of clarity, purity and refinement. You will then have an idea of the sound Neubauer can draw from his viola."

The Greenville News

"Neubauer's viola tone is warm and seductive, veiled and restrained, highly compelling and uncommonly eloquent. He made an interesting piece into a great one. Mr. Neubauer returned thanks with a "Goulash" which he evidently cooked up himself: a short, elegant Fantasie alla ungarese."

Hannoversche Allgemeine Zeitung (Germany)

"...a master musician. A true violist, Mr. Neubauer exults in his instrument's dark, rich, sumptuous tone. He combines an unerring sense of pitch with affecting lyrical warmth; he even proved himself unafraid of a little honest sentiment, a rarity among perfectionists."

The New York Times

"Neubauer is one of America's finest concert artists. His intonation was flawless, and the deep, rich tone he drew from his instrument was the purest imaginable. Neubauer met its every demand with easy grace and elegance, and achieved an extraordinary ethereal serenity with the evenness of his bowing."

The Atlanta Journal

"The afternoon was a revelation...he is acclaimed everywhere as a string player without peer among his generation of soloists. He probed to the heart of each work he played with unerring musical perception."

The Courier-Journal (Louisville)

"Surely the best violist I have ever heard...virtuoso playing caused no difficulty for Neubauer whose faultless intonation, lack of technical problems and artistic playing place him among the foremost artists of the world."

Dnevnik (Ljubljana)

"Here were scoops and slides, an amazing array of tone colors, and pyrotechnics tossed off with mischievous humor. The extraordinary thing was that it all seemed absolutely right, natural, and in good taste. Neubauer's tone is invariably beautiful, at the service of mood and expression, his bowing smooth, his phrasing elegant."

Strings

"Neubauer is one of the finest violists alive. His intonation and technical claims are faultless, and his bow arm seems to be seamless. He is able to inflect the usually timid viola with a warmth and expressiveness that command the hall. Neubauer played superbly. "

The San Juan Star (Puerto Rico)

Violist PAUL NEUBAUER PRESS QUOTES

"The string-playing world was heavily represented in the audience, and no wonder. His aristocratic posture offers the eye a complement to the virtues the ear perceives. Mr. Neubauer's seamless control of the bow, his intonation, his rich and varied tonal palette, mark him as a member of the elite."

New York Times

"It is an astonishing work (Joan Tower: Purple Rhapsody)— if you can just live through it. It assaults the senses and the emotions over and over, climbing scales in loud, jabbing, dissonant chords, ratcheting up intensity by layering agitated sounds on top of one another. Neubauer led the charge throughout, projecting powerful emissions from the lower registers, sawing on repeated pitches until the music came close to explosion, which it finally did at the end. His was an amazing performance by any standard. And he and Tower make quite a team. With Wild Purple, their first collaboration, and now Purple Rhapsody, they've made it impossible for the viola to ever again be dismissed as that nondescript entity somewhere between the violin and cello. Purple Rhapsody is extreme music for extreme times, and it achieves the impossible: It transforms the viola into an extreme, exciting instrument."

The Columbus Dispatch

"And Neubauer gave an exceptional performance of it (Joan Tower: Purple Rhapsody). The clarity and power of those opening low notes, the dazzling array of sounds he drew from his instrument, the fiery fiddling in the finale -- at times, Neubauer's playing was breathtaking. Yet although this is a showpiece for the viola, Neubauer never let it simply become showy. The emotional arc of the piece, from uncertainty and worry to exhilaration, was beautifully rendered."

Tulsa World

"A bigger more beautiful viola tone or a better command of the instrument's technical and interpretive possibilities seems inconceivable."

Daily News (New York)

"He plays his instrument with the kind of poise and maturity that place him at the top of the upper crust of musicians. Neubauer balances unflinching control, fluid bowing and sure-fire intonation with extraordinary depth of vision."

Los Angeles Times

"If there has been a better violist since William Primrose was in his prime more than a half-century ago, this listener does not know of him or her."

The Baltimore Sun

"I doubt that any viola player alive today gives a more penetrating and insightful reading of the "Arpeggione" than Paul Neubauer. He's thoroughly alive and reactive to every nuance and dynamic inflection. But he's also happy to let the music breathe naturally, particularly in the final movement, which can all too quickly degenerate into a shallow display of fast finger-and bow-work, without saying much, if anything, worthwhile about the music itself. Neubauer finds the right ebb and flow in shaping Schubert's lines, and I find his to be a totally persuasive approach. Recommended; many (and not just viola buffs) should find much to enjoy in Paul Neubauer's adroit "Arpeggione."

Fanfare

"Even more welcome is the fourth disc, which brings together the (Walton) Viola Concerto ... The viola soloist, Paul Neubauer, with his clean, firmly focused tone, keeps the music flowing in the hauntingly lyrical first movement. He is brilliant and incisive in the central Scherzo, and again in the finale he keeps the music flowing, relaxing seductively for the haunting epilogue, and using the widest possible dynamic range."

The Guardian

"Next came the viola transcription of Schumann's Five Pieces in Folk Style, in such a ravishing account by Paul Neubauer that you were left never wanting to hear them performed on cello again."

Townsville Bulletin (Australia)

"Paul Neubauer, the great American violist."

Daily Transcript (San Diego)

"His exquisite playing and his obvious love for the Bartók Viola Concerto, the work he helped revise, made an unstoppable combination. Neubauer's huge tone, warm yet animated, easily hit the back wall of the Eastman Theatre. You hung onto the energy of every note. He centered the work, musically and literally. The range of emotion in Neubauer's playing compares with the expressiveness of a great singer. The plaintive melodies are especially soulful, the spirited gypsy rhythms are particularly fiery. Neubauer's performance rated the bravos, which prompted a rare solo encore. But he didn't pick from the classical repertoire. His inspiration was the evening news. He played a true original: An Improvisation on the Washington Budget Battle. The hilarious, mocking little piece opened innocently enough with the melody from The Moldau. But then it gruffly imitated the haggling politicians, and dived sweetly into Hail to the Chief. What a treat!"

Democrat and Chronicle (Rochester)

"It's hard to imagine the solo viola part in Harold in Italy – better played than it was by Paul Neubauer. With a tone of depth as well as satin finish, he presided masterfully over ruffles and flourishes as well as lyric effusions."

The Dallas Morning News

"The program's highlight was the (Bartók) Viola Concerto, superbly played by Paul Neubauer...the work is a towering masterpiece, hauntingly beautiful, movingly expressive, encompassing every human emotion. The solo part exploits every resource of the instrument, making formidable demands on the violist. Neubauer was more than equal to its technical challenges, playing with consummate ease, an unfailingly beautiful, warm, mellow tone, and responding to every changing mood with inward expressiveness, authority and conviction. He received a standing ovation."

Epulse

"Brilliance of another sort illumined the first half, which featured Neubauer's CSO debut as well as the local premiere of the newly constructed version of the (Bartók) Viola Concerto. The result gives greater prominence to the viola and seems more grounded in the Hungarian folk idiom. Neubauer made his viola sing in all its ranges and timbres. The pure, distilled beauty of the slow movement produced a hush in the hall, while the dark plangence of the lower strings showcased the instrument's distinctive contralto. Neubauer displayed his arresting virtuosity by racing easily up and down the fingerboard, demonstrating that the viola can hold its own with its more popular cousins, the violin and cello."

The Cincinnati Post

"...the most admired chamber violist in this hemisphere."

Los Angeles Times

"Neubauer, the violist, is one of those performers who could galvanize an audience just by playing a C Major scale."

Newsday (New York)

"Neubauer probed the dark nostalgia of Robert Schumann's "Machenbilder" for Viola and Piano with acute sensitivity, then teased two wonderful Fritz Kreisler pieces into radiant bloom. More wonderful still were pieces by Georges Boulanger that pushed the Kreisler tradition of elegant salon miniatures into the stratosphere. How composition this outrageously sly can be so vivid, touching and hilarious is Neubauer's secret: He owns this music, and to hear it from him is to inhabit a unique playground of delights."

The Washington Post

"The Bartok Viola Concerto was a particular revelation, primarily because its soloist, Paul Neubauer turned in a performance of almost magical grace and artistry. Neubauer offered the 1995 edition that he himself had a hand in creating, and it would be hard to imagine a more compelling, thoughtful or nuanced interpretation of it. With his laserlike intonation and buttery sound, Neubauer single-handedly raises the viola bar a full notch."

The Hartford Courant

"Neubauer is without question one of today's foremost violists. After intermission, he came onstage in Abravanel Hall to give a powerful performance of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." Neubauer possesses a beautiful tone; his playing is musical and expressive and filled with some of the most compelling lyricism of any concert artist today. He also has tremendous technical acumen. Nothing is impossible for him; he can dazzle his audience with his virtuosity and thrill them with his soft-edged melodicism. Together with Kogan, Neubauer gave one of the most dramatic and at the same time subtle and nuanced performances of the Berlioz imaginable."

Deseret News (Salt Lake City)

"For a modern reading that comes nearer than any to the original approach sanctioned by the composer (Walton), my own choice is Paul Neubauer with Andrew Litton and the Bournemouth orchestra..."

Gramophone

"When you hear a violist as superb as Neubauer, you have to regret that more composers did not write for the instrument."

Chicago Tribune

"Neubauer is a pleasure to watch as well as to hear. His physical motion when performing is both economical and elegant and that elegance is also expressed in his tone – colorful without a trace of throatiness – and his phrasing. His playing was highly atmospheric and evocative."

The Strad

"...the presentation of this version had a special meaning because of the splendid interpretation of Neubauer. With a robust sound, lots of nuances and impeccable intonation the American Violist, a true virtuoso in every sense of the word, went through the many difficult parts of the work with ease and musicality."

The Nation (Buenos Aires)

"Paul Neubauer is the Sir Yehudi Menuhin of the viola. Think of the purity, simplicity and frail beauty of Menuhin's violin playing and transpose to an alto without any loss of clarity, purity and refinement. You will then have an idea of the sound Neubauer can draw from his viola."

The Greenville News

"Neubauer's viola tone is warm and seductive, veiled and restrained, highly compelling and uncommonly eloquent. He made an interesting piece into a great one. Mr. Neubauer returned thanks with a "Goulash" which he evidently cooked up himself: a short, elegant Fantasia alla ungarese."

Hannoversche Allgemeine Zeitung (Germany)

"...a master musician. A true violist, Mr. Neubauer exults in his instrument's dark, rich, sumptuous tone. He combines an unerring sense of pitch with affecting lyrical warmth; he even proved himself unafraid of a little honest sentiment, a rarity among perfectionists."

New York Times

"Neubauer is one of America's finest concert artists. His intonation was flawless, and the deep, rich tone he drew from his instrument was the purest imaginable. Neubauer met its every demand with easy grace and elegance, and achieved an extraordinary ethereal serenity with the evenness of his bowing."

The Atlanta Journal

"The afternoon was a revelation...he is acclaimed everywhere as a string player without peer among his generation of soloists. He probed to the heart of each work he played with unerring musical perception."

The Courier-Journal (Louisville)

"Surely the best violist I have ever heard...virtuoso playing caused no difficulty for Neubauer whose faultless intonation, lack of technical problems and artistic playing place him among the foremost artists of the world."

Dnevnik (Ljubljana)

"Here were scoops and slides, an amazing array of tone colors, and pyrotechnics tossed off with mischievous humor. The extraordinary thing was that it all seemed absolutely right, natural, and in good taste. Neubauer's tone is invariably beautiful, at the service of mood and expression, his bowing smooth, his phrasing elegant."

Strings

"Neubauer is one of the finest violists alive. His intonation and technical claims are faultless, and his bow arm seems to be seamless. He is able to inflect the usually timid viola with a warmth and expressiveness that command the hall. Neubauer played superbly. "

The San Juan Star (Puerto Rico)